A shutdown is not a slam dunk.

Congress has to get to work that day along with their staff and there are a large number of other government workers and non-government workers. (Taxis, Ubers, restaurant staff to feed people, if any are still in business, so forth.)

If the mayor shuts it down completely, they can't count the Electoral College votes.

If she does it incompletely, it adds friction but may or not be effective.

If she does checkpoints, they will clog up the city. This impacts the same people above: Congress, their staff and other workers. Not all of them can afford to live in the city and be there the night before.

If D.C. is blocked, the meetup will happen somewhere else. Do you think anyone who came long distances is going to say "Oh geeze, she shut it down, I'll go home"?

She can only try, not succeed.

Virtual Congress is a non-starter.

The 116th Congress had all of last year to go virtual and didn't. The closest they came is was allowing proxy voting. it won't be virtual on the 6th.

That congress (117th) doesn't get sworn in until the a few days before, has to show up for that, and then would have to create and pass rules to go virtual.

A valid strategy is to make your opponents make the bad move. If the mayor tries to lockdown the city, it's probably worse for her in the long run, and that alone makes the rally on the 6th effective.

The two southernmost Metro stations for the blue line (Franconia-Springfield and Van Dorn) are supposed to have been reopened a few days before, but I'll bet that doesn't happen and they're still closed.

"The Franconia-Springfield and Van Dorn Street Metro stations will be closed for two weeks as part of work to upgrade its signal system.

The closure will take place from Saturday, Dec. 19 to Sunday, Jan. 3. That's in addition to weekend closures that started on Nov. 27 and will end on March 14."

Plan for it, but it's not where the weather pattern in VA/MD/DC usually goes.

Expect cold wind and damp, so have some nice warm boots with nice warm insoles. If you have a coat with layers, that's perfect. You might want to layer your gloves, though, by bringing some of those cheapy stretch knit gloves as your underlayer.

Don't bring your phone, even though that makes it hard to check train status. The service has already been cut drastically too and almost all in person amenities are shut down until 1/15.

Yes, they do transmit tons of data in Airplane mode, they just do not transmit things that would interfere with an airplane, hence the name.

No, but they record your locations with timestamps and then broadcast them after you turn the phone back to regular mode. Saw a demonstration of this on Fox News a couple of years back. Reporter put phone in airplane mode, went to various stores and buildings, turned phone back to regular mode, and the locations/times went right out.

Why not bring your phone? There's a lot of threads on that here, but basically it's a massive security risk.

During the event you'll be tagged as a dissident and tracked, with that info passed to antifa should you end up isolated. Once you leave you'll be targeted by all the alphabet agencies for the rest of your life unless Trump purges then Stalin style.

They'll grab all your data and use it against you. Don't give them the opportunity

Yeah, I'm expecting a lot of transportation to get locked down (metro, perhaps bridges) and/or be inaccessible (uber/lyft/anything relying on phone signal.) It would be very helpful if people familiar with the city could give tips about where could be good places to set as a homebase, or leave the car for a long period of time at, that are walkable. I know that some people cannot walk a long distance, but there are many of us for whom a couple hours walk and/or rough neighborhoods are really not a big deal. Becoming stranded, however, could be a real problem, especially in the likelihood that a curfew is called and we want to avoid being arrested for something so dumb.

Honestly a lot of people don't own cold weather equipment because it's expensive. A good quality 0° sleeping bag is $125ish absolute minimum. And don't you dare buy an advertised 0° bag from Walmart or Amazon for less because they are piles of shit and you'll absolutely freeze to death. I've been there, almost died. Then you need a good quality sleeping pad to insulate you from the ground. That's $60 minimum. Then you need a high quality tent with full rain fly sized exactly for the number of people that will be in it and all of that aids with temperature retainment of the hot air your bodies warm up. That's gonna be about $100ish minimum for a good 1 person tent. $200ish+ for multi person tents.

So you're talking $290ish just for bag, mat, and tent for a SINGLE person. About $550+ for other quality equipment including lighting, tarp for under the tent, batteries, good wool socks and thermal undergarments, etc.

Worth every penny though, as I live in the frozen, northernmost Siberian asscrack of Upper Michigan where our winter temps are routinely below zero (pretty mild this year however, hovering in the teens since October)

But yeah people need to layer up, keep calorie dense snacks and water water water on them. Fucking hydrate, people.

Go to a thrift store and buy a very thick jacket, pants, and gloves. Be prepared to keep moving in freezing cold.

"Occupy" style won't work. That only works when the politicians want it (ex: force police to stand down for rioters, but to arrest people who defend themselves).

Just stay away from the green line! A cop in Prince George county told me the reason you can drive 90 MPH on the highway in MD is because they are too busy with murders.

Seeing lots of good suggestions about getting in DC and getting out.

Other considerations that would likely require some pre-planning.

Charter transportation from outer burbs to city center. Car pools Boats

Travel updates on specific "frequencies" - ie.  State Police have 4 lane bridge down to 1 for "Construction."

Consider looking at Airbnb near MD and using uber or lyft to go to DC for the day. That way you can get smashed and let RINOs know the rope ia coming.

Edit: Forgot to add to check on the rates as well for those rideshare services. If you're like 20 minutes from DC in MD it shouldnt be too expensive.

Fuck Airbnb, dont use those assholes. Stay in a motel a decent distance away from DC if you're driving.

In November we stayed at the Comfort Inn on 13th st downtown. They have a deal with a parking garage down the street for $10 a night. The hotel itself was $100 a night after all the taxes.

guys guys guys - the subways will not be running anytime around January 6. I guarantee it. The whole city will shut down EVERYTHING in an effort to keep you OUT.

You should fully expect airlines to cancel flights into DC during that week, because last-minute reasons.

Gas up and drive. Bring your food & water & supplies. Imagine you're going to an abandoned city that looks like something out of The Walking Dead. Because you are.

Try to book a room in Crystal Ciy or Alexandria VA. I saw 4star hotels on hotwire for 65 bucks last night.

They kept the metro running the past two marches even though they were highly advertised. Hopefully that doesn't change this time. Staying out in rockville or bethesda is a good idea. Lot of hotels. 20 minute metro ride directly in on the red line. Metro Center is your stop.

Be careful of ANTIFA. They target and attack stragglers trying to make it back to their rooms.

Stay in large groups. Get ready to defend yourselves.

God speed, patriots.

It's likely the city will not have the resources from a funding standing point to stop this. They are hard up for cash just like all the other Pandemic cities. They are waiting for Biden to bail them out. I guess they will be waiting until 2025 or longer. lol

Virginia Railway Express is a great alternative to metro:

<https://www.vre.org/>

VRE will not shut down and stations are a short walk from the Capitol (Union Station) or the mall (Le Enfant).

Just be aware that you must buy tickets and mark them as used before boarding the train or you can be fined. They have a mobile app for ticketing.

You'll stand out from the gov worker drones in your MAGA gear, but no need to be concerned about a mob coming after you at a station. There is also a lot more room to spread out and a restroom is available in each car.

Which area of DC will be the "closest" to the rally/protest? Like if I wanted to be staying right where the action is? I realize it will be a huge group, so the answer might be "all of it".

Family was AF stationed at Andrews AFB. Spent a lot of time in this area.

DO NOT TAKE THE METRO DURING THIS EVENT!!!

I have been on the Metro multiple times when the thing just stopped. I mean came to a dead stop for no apparent reason. Near a station, just past a station, in a tunnel, you name it. And nobody's getting off until the next time they deign to stop a station. And sometimes they will not stop at the next station!

These people know we are coming and it is not above them to fuck with us. Don't give them the chance.

The Metro is the box canyon of public transportation, frens!
